The Princess Xarifa reclined one day upon her silken cushions, looking forth from the window of her apartment on the valley below. Within, it was cool and shady, the floor was of white marble, and Xarifas little feet, in their embroidered slippers, rested lovingly on a footstool of fresh roses of every shade; draperies of pale green silk adorned the walls, save where they were covered with scrolls of blue and scarlet touched with gold, containing wise or sacred sentences. Through a silver grating inserted in the floor ascended the delicate fragrance of Oriental perfumes, which rising to the perforated ceiling passed into the adjoining gallery. B Outside this cool retreat, it was breathless noon. The little stream that threaded the valley shrank from the blaze of the burning sun into the shelter of the sedges on its margin, and nothing living...
