It is most interesting to hear from Romain Rolland himself the genesis of a book that has stirred two continents. While he was in Rome, ten years before the first volume appeared, he conceived the idea of the whole book, planned the chapters, and entirely composed a great part of the volumes which are yet to be published. . . I was isolated, stifling like so many others in France in a world of moral enmity. I wished to breathe, I wished to react against an unhealthy civilization, against opinion corrupted by a false minority. I wished to say to this minority: You lie! you do not represent France. For this I needed a hero with clear vision and a pure heart, whose soul was unsullied enough to give him the right to speak and whose voice was strong enough to make itself heard. I built this hero patiently. Before deciding to write the first line of my book I carried it within me for years; Christophe did not start on his journey until I had seen his road to the end .
